Priapism is a clinical condition in which an erection persists for longer than 4 hours. Priapism associated with anticoagulation therapy has been described previously in the setting of cavernous malignancy, benign penile tumors, sickle cell disease, and use of phenytoin. We report the case of a 63-year-old man with a history of thyrotoxicosis and recent warfarin initiation who presented to our emergency department with a 2-week history of painful penile erection. On examination, the patient was noted to have a suprapubic tender mass, which was diagnosed on ultrasound examination as a heterogeneous mass consistent with a he
